We all have that one friend that we've been meaning to talk to. You know the one. They're the one you love, but they keep making poor decisions. Maybe you've even sort of brought it up to them, but when you hit a little resistance, you stopped. There's a point in all our relationships where we should help those we love by holding them accountable for their sin or poor choices. But are you brave enough to do it? It's not easy to have those types of conversations. Maybe because we fear it'll hurt their feelings or damage our relationship. Or maybe we're afraid the person won't recognize that it's coming from a place of love.

The old saying rings true. People don't care how much you know until they know how much you care. But how can you show you care about others? Part of shining our light is actively pointing people to Jesus -not just the passive, "live a good life and maybe they'll notice" mentality that many of us are guilty of having. We also ought to challenge others out of their sin for the sake of their spiritual lives.
